Abstract:

The domains in which there is a risk for corruption acts are diverse, even if we talk about clear objectives, with clear tasks, as the ones established for Romania's adhesion to Schengen space. In the same manner, the corruption phenomena can take place at any level.

The manner of prevention and combating of corruption depends on the stage of this phenomenon within a certain environment. As it emerges from the explanation attempts in this paper, the corruption develops in relation with the business and economic environment, furthermore, at the interference of the public and private environment, within the domains in which the public decisions affect the activity of the private agents from the economic point of view. Besides the large number of laws that refer to corruption, there have been created institutions with the purpose of fighting against this phenomenon.

In spite of the ancient history of corruption and of the presence of this phenomenon in every society, it has been said that a definition of corruption could never have the same level of acceptance in all countries.

The active corruption within the private sector has been treated, during the last century by the civil law (for example within the law regarding the competition), by the merchant law or by general dispositions of the criminal law. The incrimination of the private corruption has emerged as a necessary and innovative effort to avoid all the gaps of a global strategy of fighting against corruption.
