Metafunction In Interpretive Framework

As we all know, communication is inherently two-way. We use our language to interact with other people and to exchange meanings with other people. Apart from these functions, we also use it to talk about the world, either the external world, things, events, qualities, etc, or our internal world, thoughts, beliefs, feelings, etc. The discourse of men and women forms two systems which are in many ways distinct from each other, although they grow up in the same families, they are educated together, they form families together, and they work together in the same companies and offices. As we will see, in many situations, men and women are involved in a miscommunication. Therefore, what I am going to do in the following paragraphs is to illustrate how men and women come to misinterpret each other, even when they approach communication with the best of intentions.
