

《The Warlord of Mars》 Chapter 10 - In Durance

The public houses of Barsoom, I have found, vary but little. There is no privacy for other than married Men without their wives are escorted to a large chamber, the floor of which is usually of white marble or very clean. Here are many small, raised platforms for the guest's sleeping silks and furs, and if he have none of his own, he may be furnished at a nominal charge.

Once a man's belongings have been deposited upon one of these platforms he is a guest of the house, and he may leave. No one will disturb or molest his belongings, as there are no thieves upon Mars.

As assassination is the one thing to be feared, the proprietors of the hostelries furnish armed guards, within the sleeping-rooms day and night. The number of guards and gorgeousness of their trappings quite usually depends upon the rank of the guest.

No meals are served in these houses, but generally a public eating place adjoins them. Baths are connected with each guest is required to bathe daily or depart from the hotel.

Usually on a second or third floor there is a large sleeping-room for single women guests, but its appointment is on the chamber occupied by men. The guards who watch the women remain in the corridor outside the sleeping-rooms, pacing back and forth among the sleepers within, ready to notify the warriors should their presence be required.

I was surprised to note that all the guards with the hotel at which we stopped were red men, and on inquiry I learned that they were slaves purchased by the proprietors of the hotels from the government. The man whose post was to be had been commander of the navy of a great Martian nation; but fate had carried his flagship across the ice-barrier of the magnetic shaft, and now for many tedious years he had been a slave of the yellow men.

He told me that princes, jeds, and even jeddaks of the outer world, were among the menials who served him if he had heard of the fate of Mors Kajak or Tardos Mors he shook his head, saying that he never had heard of them, though he was very familiar with the reputations and fame they bore in the outer world.

Neither had he heard any rumor of the coming of the Father of Therns and the black dator of the First Battalion. He knew little of what took place within the palace. I could see that he wondered not a little that a yellow man should be so ignorant of customs and conditions of the outer world.

In fact, I had forgotten my disguise upon discovering a red man pacing before my sleeping platform; but my quickness of perception warned me in time, for I had no mind to reveal my identity to any unless some good could come of it, and a yellow man could serve me yet, though I had it in my mind that later I might be the means of serving him and all the other slaves who do the bidding of their stern masters in Kadabra.

Thuvan Dihn and I discussed our plans as we sat together among our sleeping silks and furs that night in the apartment occupied by the yellow men who occupied the apartment with us. We spoke in low whispers, but, as that is only what courtesy demands, we roused no suspicion.

At last, determining that all must be but idle speculation until after we had had a chance to explore the city, we bade each other good night and turned to sleep.

After breakfasting the following morning we set out to see Kadabra, and as, through the generosity of the palace, we were well supplied with the funds current in Okar we purchased a handsome ground flier. Having learned to drive it, we spent a delightful and profitable day exploring the city, and late in the afternoon at the hour Talu told us we would be required to attend their offices, we stopped before a magnificent building on the plaza opposite the royal grounds and the palace.

Here we walked boldly in past the armed guard at the door, to be met by a red slave within who asked of us, "Tell Sorav, your master, that two warriors from Illall wish to take service in the palace guard," I said.

Sorav, Talu had told us, was the commander of the forces of the palace, and as men from the further cities were less likely to be tainted with the germ of intrigue which had for years infected the household of Salen, we were well welcomed and few questions asked us.

He had primed us with such general information as he thought would be necessary for us to pass muster. We would have to undergo a further examination before Salensus Oll that he might determine our physical fitness.

The little experience we had had with the strange hooked sword of the yellow man and his cuplike shield at either of us could pass this final test, but there was the chance that we might be quartered in the palace of Sorav before being accepted by Sorav before the Jeddak of Jeddaks would find time to put us to the final test.

After a wait of several minutes in an ante-chamber we were summoned into the private office of Sorav, greeted by this ferocious-appearing, black-bearded officer. He asked us our names and stations in our own city, and when our answers were evidently satisfactory to him, he put certain questions to us that Talu had foreseen and prepared us for.

The interview could not have lasted over ten minutes when Sorav summoned an aid whom he instructed to escort us to the quarters in the palace which are set aside for aspirants to membership in the palace guard.

The aid took us to his own office first, where he measured and weighed and photographed us simultaneously. For that purpose, five copies being instantly reproduced in five different offices of the government, several cities miles distant. Then he led us through the palace grounds to the main guardroom of the palace, there to await our charge.

This individual again questioned us briefly, and finally despatched a soldier to guide us to our quarters. They were on the second floor of the palace in a semi-detached tower at the rear of the edifice.

When we asked our guide why we were quartered so far from the guardroom he replied that the custom of picking quarrels with aspirants to try their metal had resulted in so many deaths that it was found difficult to maintain strength while this custom prevailed. Salensus Oll had, therefore, set apart these quarters for aspirants, and set them apart against the danger of attack by members of the guard.

This unwelcome information put a sudden check to all our well-laid plans, for it meant that we should give up our chance of membership in Salensus Oll until the time that he should see fit to give us the final examination for efficiency.

As it was this interval upon which we had banked to accomplish so much in our search for Dejah Thoris, our hope was unbounded when we heard the great lock click behind our guide as he had quitted us after ushering us into our quarters.

With a wry face I turned to Thuvan Dihn. My companion but shook his head disconsolately and walked to the far side of the apartment.

Scarcely had he gazed beyond them than he called to me in a tone of suppressed excitement and surprise.

"Look!" said Thuvan Dihn, pointing toward the courtyard below.

As my eyes followed the direction indicated I saw two women pacing back and forth in an enclosed garden.

At the same moment I recognized them--they were Dejah Thoris and Thuvia of Ptarth!

There were they whom I had trailed from one pole to another, the length of a world. Only ten feet of space separated me from them.

With a cry I attracted their attention, and as Dejah Thoris looked up full into my eyes I made the sign of friendship. I made them make to their women.

To my astonishment and horror her head went high, and as a look of utter contempt touched her finely carved face she turned back full upon me. My body is covered with the scars of a thousand conflicts, but never in all my long life have I felt the sting of a wound, for this time the steel of a woman's look had entered my heart.

With a groan I turned away and buried my face in my arms. I heard Thuvan Dihn call aloud to Thuvia, but the look of surprise betokened that he, too, had been repulsed by his own daughter.

"They will not even listen," he cried to me. "They have put their hands over their ears and walked to the other side of the garden. Have you heard you of such mad work, John Carter? The two must be bewitched."

Presently I mustered the courage to return to the window, for even though she spurned me I loved her, and I was gazing upon her divine face and figure, but when she saw me looking she again turned away.

I was at my wit's end to account for her strange actions, and that Thuvia, too, had turned against her father. Could it be that my incomparable princess still clung to the hideous faith from which I had rescued her world? Could she hate me with loathing and contempt because I had returned from the Valley Dor, or because I had desecrated the ten altars of the heathens?

To naught else could I ascribe her strange deportment, yet it seemed far from possible that such could be the result of her love for John Carter had been a great and wondrous love-- far above racial distinctions, creed, or religion.

As I gazed ruefully at the back of her haughty, royal head a gate at the opposite end of the garden opened.

so he turned and slipped something into the hand of the yellow guardsman beyond the gate, nor was the distant see that money had passed between them.

Instantly I knew that this newcomer had bribed his way within the garden. Then he turned in the direction that he was none other than Thurid, the black dator of the First Born.

He approached quite close to them before he spoke, and as they turned at the sound of his voice I saw D. There was a nasty leer upon his face as he stepped close to her and spoke again. I could not hear his words.

"The granddaughter of Tardos Mors can always die," she said, "but she could never live at the price you

Then I saw the black scoundrel go upon his knees beside her, fairly groveling in the dirt, pleading with her to me, for though he was evidently laboring under the stress of passion and excitement, it was equally apparent his voice for fear of detection.

"I would save you from Matai Shang," I heard him say. "You know the fate that awaits you at his hands. Better than the other?"

"I would choose neither," replied Dejah Thoris, "even were I free to choose, as you know well I am not."

"You ARE free!" he cried. "John Carter, Prince of Helium, is dead."

"I know better than that; but even were he dead, and I must needs choose another mate, it should be a plain preference to either Matai Shang or you, black calot," she answered with a sneer of contempt.

Of a sudden the vicious beast lost all control of himself, as with a vile oath he leaped at the slender woman in his brute clutch. Thuvia screamed and sprang to aid her fellow-prisoner, and at the same instant I, too, when that spanned my window I ripped them from their sockets as they had been but copper wire.

Hurling myself through the aperture I reached the garden, but a hundred feet from where the black was crouching Dejah Thoris, and with a single great bound I was upon him. I spoke no word as I tore his defiling fingers from her hair as a sound as I hurled him twenty feet from me.

Foaming with rage, Thurid regained his feet and charged me like a mad bull.

"Yellow man," he shrieked, "you knew not upon whom you had laid your vile hands, but ere I am done you shall know what it means to offend the person of a First Born."

Then he was upon me, reaching for my throat, and precisely as I had done that day in the courtyard of the palace of Salensus Oll. I ducked beneath his outstretched arms, and as he lunged past me I struck the side of his jaw.

Just as he had done upon that other occasion he did now. Like a top he spun round, his knees gave beneath him, and he fell to the ground at my feet. Then I heard a voice behind me.

It was the deep voice of authority that marks the ruler of men, and when I turned to face the resplendent woman I did not need to ask to know that it was Salensus Oll. At his right stood Matai Shang, and behind them a score of attendants.

"Who are you," he cried, "and what means this intrusion within the precincts of the women's garden? I did not see you here?"

But for his last words I should have forgotten my disguise entirely and told him outright that I was John Carter. His question recalled me to myself. I pointed to the dislodged bars of the window above.

"I am an aspirant to membership in the palace guard," I said, "and from yonder window in the tower where the final test for fitness I saw this brute attack the this woman. I could not stand idly by, O Jeddak, and see this disgrace upon the palace grounds, and yet feel that I was fit to serve and guard your royal person."

I had evidently made an impression upon the ruler of Okar by my fair words, and when he had turned to Dejah Thoris, and both had corroborated my statements it began to look pretty dark for Thurid.

I saw the ugly gleam in Matai Shang's evil eyes as Dejah Thoris narrated all that had passed between them. She came to that part which dealt with my interference with the dator of the First Born her gratitude was quite apparent in her eyes that something puzzled her strangely.

I did not wonder at her attitude toward me while others were present; but that she should have denied me to the other occupants of the garden still cut me sorely.

As the examination proceeded I cast a glance at Thurid and startled him looking wide-eyed and wondering. Then he laughed full in my face.

A moment later Salensus Oll turned toward the black.

"What have you to say in explanation of these charges?" he asked in a deep and terrible voice. "Dare you suggest that the ruler of Therns has chosen--one who might even be a fit mate for the Jeddak of Jeddaks himself?"

And then the black-bearded tyrant turned and cast a sudden greedy look upon Dejah Thoris, as though w